

We are an aging nation. Since 2011, baby boomers have been turning 65 at an average rate of 10,000 per day. This will continue until 2030. And we are living longer. Fortunately, we are also healthier and more active than past generations.

But the reality, according to the Administration on Aging (AOA), is that “70% of people turning age 65 can expect to use some form of long-term care during their lives.” 35% will spend some time in a long-term care facility, such as a nursing home or assisted living community.

WHAT IS LONG-TERM CARE?

Long-term care encompasses a wide range of supportive services used by people who need help to function in their daily lives. Long-term care and services are those that help with the instrumental activities of daily living (IADLs): managing finances, handling transportation, shopping, doing laundry, preparing meals, household and basic home maintenance, using the telephone and other communication devices — as well as the activities of daily living (ADLs), defined as self-care activities: getting dressed, toileting, bathing and showering, personal hygiene and grooming, eating, and functional mobility.

The duration and level of care each person requires is as individual as the person needing the support. On average, a person will need three years of long-term care. Women will need services longer than men because they typically live longer. And 20% of older adults requiring long-term care services will need care for longer than 5 years.

HOME AND COMMUNITY-BASED SERVICES (HCBS)

Most long-term care is not medical care. It includes home and community-based services (HCBS). These are the services and supports that provide assistance with daily activities that help older adults and people with disabilities to remain in their homes. Home can be their own homes or apartments, in assisted living, congregate care, or supportive living. Services such as chore assistance, transportation, meals, adult day services, and personal care are all considered HCBS.

While the majority of people would prefer to age-in-place in their own homes or apartments, this isn't always feasible from a safety and/or financial perspective. Caring for someone in their own home can be the most expensive option, especially if 24/7 care is required. This option works best if someone needs limited support. But as needs increase, so does cost. And because someone who may have a condition that limits mobility, this option can also be isolating.

(cont'd)

HOUSING OPTIONS

Independent retirement housing, assisted living, skilled nursing, and continuing care retirement communities are all housing options. Assisted living and skilled nursing sometimes include memory care. Each housing options has pros and cons, and the best fit for a person needing the support is determined by a number of factors such as the level of care required, financial situation, understanding the person's personality, preferences, and values, the quality of service available, and location (proximity to family and additional supports are the usual considerations).

Adult Day Programs are often a great choice for families who chose to keep a loved one at home. Adult day programs offer life enrichment, social engagement and an opportunity for caregiver respite, an often overlooked essential for caregiver health.

Genworth Financial offers an annual Cost of Care Survey. From our experience, though, while the survey presents an average of monthly and annual costs for different housing types in the Seattle metro area, the costs reflected are lower than what we encounter when assisting our clients in finding the right housing option.

HOW CAN AN AGING LIFE CARE PROFESSIONAL™ HELP?

Aging Life Care Professionals provide a wide range of expert help and support. We understand aging and can help families navigate the course of chronic conditions such as a cognitive impairment, and connect families and individuals with the best resources and supports.

We are experienced in working with complicated family dynamics. We also know how to work collaboratively with attorneys, financial planners, housing professionals and health care practitioners on behalf of our clients.

Sometimes clients meet one or two times with a care manager. Other clients need help on an ongoing basis. For those that need ongoing services, we can monitor care, make recommendations and make adjustments in the plan of care. We make sure that everyone involved is moving in the same direction. Communication is the cornerstone of everything we do.

(cont'd)

206.456.5155

www.agingwisdom.com

AGING WISDOM'S FOCUS

Our focus is on enabling decisions and implementing solutions with a long, holistic view. Providing tools and resources to make informed choices, our guidance and expertise leads families to decisions and actions that ensure quality care and an optimal life for those they love, thus reducing worry, stress and time off of work for family caregivers through:

- Family Coaching and Support
- Quality of Life Advocate
- Health Advocacy
- Home Care Oversight
- Household Coordination
- Legal Referrals and Collaboration
- Financial Coordination
- Crisis Intervention

Our goal in everything we do is to help families navigate the options for aging well.

We are ready to listen, help problem-solve and manage anticipated challenges as well as address crises. Call to schedule a consultation at 206.456.5155, ext.1

Aging Wisdom's care managers are members of the Aging Life Care Association™ (ALCA). ALCA's mission is to lead the community of Aging Life Care Professionals™ through education, professional development, and the highest ethical standards. Learn more at aginglifecare.org

